We Can Transform Healthcare by Measuring What Matters

Healthcare systems are struggling - not because we lack treatments, but because we are not consistently measuring the outcomes that matter most to patients.

Healthcare systems worldwide face rising costs, growing demand, and persistent variation in patient outcomes. Too often, success is measured by processes and volume – not by whether patients are living better lives.

ICHOM addresses this challenge by bringing together patients, clinicians, and experts to define what truly matters to people living with a condition.

Through global outcome standards, ICHOM enables health systems to measure, compare, and learn from real-world patient outcomes.

This shared learning drives improvement, supports innovation, and helps ensure better, more equitable care for every patient.

What Happens When We Measure What Matters?

When Carla, a single mom from Texas, was diagnosed with diabetes, her care felt reduced to numbers – blood sugar, weight, medication. No one asked how she was feeling or how her condition was affecting her life.

That changed when her clinic began using the ICHOM Diabetes Set – a global standard designed to focus on outcomes that matter to patients.

For the first time, her doctor asked:
What do you want your care to help you do?

Her answer:

Have the energy to play with my son after work.

Together, they adapted her treatment plan to support her life – not just her lab results.

Months later, Carla was thriving. Her numbers improved. But more importantly, so did her joy. She could run around the park with her son again.

If we are not treating the patient's needs and improving their life, how can we know if our traditional measures can be trusted?
